CALL FOR PRESENTATION PROPOSALS DESCRIPTION:

In a divisive era of constricted media consumption and related over-simplification of complex issues relevant to matters long central to anthropology, it is crucial the messages we deliver are accessible. It’s crucial we “get the message across.” As instructors we face stiff competition in the battle for attention. Consumers of information can turn to any number of media outlets that get their messages across, however lacking in analysis and critical engagement they may be, extremely effectively. To address this issue, presenters in this conference should focus on the importance of teaching and practicing in this era, including ways of enhancing accessibility and more effectively getting the message across. We propose that with engaging presentation and delivery of our material, we can achieve a broader appeal than we tend to have. We can intervene and provide an outlet for information as well.

You may address any relevant aspect of this issue, such as examples of teaching strategies, cases of success or failure in this area, content-specific areas related to this issue (for example, a focus on race, gender, etc.), commentary on this issue, etc. We welcome any idea related to the importance of getting the message across.

Please take note of the material under “Presentation Type” below for more information on approaches to presenting.

If you have any questions or concerns, please contact Evin Rodkey, SACC President:
